

"Life can't be reduced to binary... Our lives are stored in bits, messages turned to network packets. Living spaces arranged in human-sized pixels."

Our lives are stored in bits...

When you take a step back and really observe how we use modern technology, this quote could not be more true. It is so weird how over the span of about a decade, we as a society have become accustomed to carrying around little devices (that might as well be an extension of ourselves) with us everywhere. You can take one look at someone's phone and learn a bit about them before even speaking to them. What does the case look like? What is their lock screen? What about the size or brand of the phone? We carry these machines so close to our hearts, that we put our lives into them. They have become a part of us. I think it's just really interesting.
